The New Rules of Trust in the Digital Age

Who and how we trust is changing radically and rapidly. The implications for organizations, institutions and society are immense. Rachel Botsman spells these out with clarity, humor and optimism, offering practical tips on how to circumnavigate a new era where we are trusting strangers and bots more than established authority.

The trust we used to put in institutions – government, banks, media, charities, churches – has hit an all-time low. Welcome, instead, to the age of 'distributed trust', spurred on by new technologies and playing out between individuals, who now have more credibility than institutions. Customers have become social ambassadors who define brands.

But when all the traditional rules of trust change, the crucial question is: how do industries critically reliant on trust – from banking and the media to travel and tourism – adapt to survive? How can you remain competitive when every old wisdom about how trust is built, managed, lost and repaired, is being turned on its head?

Rachel Botsman guides us through this uncharted landscape with enlightening anecdotes – and explores what lies ahead for business and human relationships.

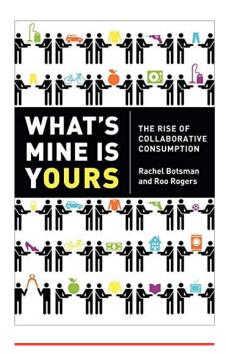

The Collaborative Economy: A Transformative Lens, Not A Start-Up Trend

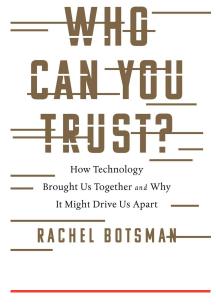

The collaborative/sharing economy is creating entirely new ways of doing business that are significantly impacting the way we live, work, bank and consume. We're now more likely than ever before to trust strangers more than established authorities: we're opening our homes and our cars to them.

Rachel takes audiences deep inside the ventures that are challenging the status quo – from Airbnb to Lyft, TaskRabbit to Transferwise – and identifies common reasons that make a sector ripe for disruption. She guides us through how start-ups think differently about value, trust and scale. She leaves audiences inspired by the scale and growth in the collaborative economy and provides clear insights on how organizations can think like an entrepreneur to respond to some of the most revolutionary changes we've seen in business and society in centuries.
